Another revelation contributes to clarify even more how the threads of Donald Trump's behavior move inside the White House.

A large report published last Monday by the New York Magazine explains it. The article reveals aspects that push into the background Trumps' famous addiction for golf.

The document reveals his devotion for the far-right television network Fox News.

The article adds that there are daily links between the president, the New York Magazine and the star host of Fox News, Sean Hannity.

The leader, amid the turmoil that hit him from every angle, has found another new addiction by exchanging his government strategies with the ultra conservative Hannity and at the same time knowing "the last political gossips of the United States."

Close sources to the leader informed the New York Magazine that "the feeling is that Hannity is the cabinet leader outside the White House."

The magazine argues that Hannity is filling the void left by Steve Bannon former White House Chief Strategist.

Hannity even belongs to a chosen group of authorized officers to call the president directly.

The New York Times said previously that Donald Trump spends several hours a day watching television, and his main source of news is Fox News.

According to the report, circulated in January, the president begins every day around 5:30 a.m. watching Fox News followed by "Fox & Friends."

His favorite TV shows include "Fox & Friends", as well as the show host by Sean Hannity.

However, the most watched show is the one he is having among the stern walls of the White House.
