Cuban Communist Party First Secretary Raul Castro welcomed President Miguel Díaz-Canel and his entourage near midnight Wednesday, upon their return from Argentina where they attended the inauguration of President Alberto Fernández and Vice President Cristina Fernández.

Díaz-Canel wrapped an intense visit, where he witnessed a historic and hopeful moment for the South American country with the assumption of the country's new leadership.

That was the reason that took him for the first time to Buenos Aires with non-stop days that concluded on Wednesday with a meeting in the Casa Rosada with the new president and then with Vice President Cristina Fernández, who welcomed him at the National Congress.

With Alberto Fernández, he shared the common will to strengthen bilateral relations and promoting economic-commercial relations.

"We have a commitment of friendship with Cuba," the Argentinean president told his Cuban counterpart.

In addition to his meeting with Alberto and Cristina Fernández, Díaz-Canel toured one of the largest clandestine centers of the last military dictatorship in Argentina (1976-1983), the former School of Mechanics of the Navy, accompanied by several of the torture center's survivors.
