
Cuban President Raul Castro Begins Visit's Agenda in Russia

07/05/2015

Cuban President Raul Castro begins the visits to Russia today with a meeting with Prime Minister Dmitri Medvedev, to review the course of signed agreements and promote new projects of bilateral interest.

Raul Castro is complying an invitation by his Russian peer, Vladimir Putin, on occasion of the official celebrations for the 70th anniversary of the victory over fascism, to which many heads of State and leaders of international organizations will attend as a guests.

This is the third visit of the Cuban statesman, since the first one held early 2009, as a President, when the two leaders signed a Memorandum on the principles of Strategic Collaboration between the governments of Russia and Cuba.

Later, during a three-day stay in Moscow, in July 2012, as part of an international tour, the Caribbean president talked with top Russian leaders, and assessed the course of the agreements aimed at expressing the strategic nature in the Russian-Cuban ties.

This visit takes place in the context of the successful celebration of the special session of the Inter-governmental Commission for the Economic-Commercial and Scientific-Technical Collaboration, on April 22, and resulted in a dozen of sealed documents in several fields of cooperation.

With that background, Prime Minister Medvedev stressed the comprehensive nature of relations with Cuba, a country that he described as one of Russia's main partners in Latin America, after welcoming the Vice President of the Council of Ministers, Ricardo Cabrisas, visiting Moscow.

According to a note from the government, the executive head and the Cuban statesman will examine today the prospects of joint projects in energy, transportation, health and pharmaceuticals, identified by the parties as the most promissory spheres.
